

Defense, Finland-Netherlands-United Kingdom launch an axis on procurement: can it also be an opportunity for Italy?

Published on 22/03/2026

Finland, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom have announced the start of a joint effort to explore the creation, by 2027, of a new mechanism dedicated to defense financing and joint procurement. The goal is to aggregate demand, accelerate investments, and increase the availability of critical capabilities, starting with ammunition.

The initiative arises in the context of the worsening European security scenario, marked by the war in Ukraine and the increasingly evident need among allies to strengthen deterrence, industrial production, and supply speed.

What the project entails

According to the joint statement, the new tool should work with existing partners and institutions, complementing NATO and EU initiatives. The logic is clear: combine orders, provide greater predictability to the industry, contain costs, and speed up the delivery of operational capabilities.

For London, Helsinki, and The Hague, the challenge is no longer just to increase defense spending, but to make it more efficient through common financing and procurement formulas. The reference to ammunition confirms that one of the central points will be strengthening European and Western production chains.

Why it may interest Italy

For Italy, the dossier can represent a concrete opportunity, especially on the industrial and strategic level. Rome has a significant defense base, large national groups, and consolidated experience in multinational programs. Potential involvement would allow entry into new circuits of aggregated demand, strengthen the positioning of the Italian industry, and participate in defining future common programs.

The condition, however, is to move with a clear line. For Italy, it would make sense to participate only if the new mechanism becomes a useful tool to support national supply chains, production capacity, and industrial presence in today's most sensitive segments, such as ammunition, vehicles, electronics, and integrated systems. More than a symbolic choice, it would therefore be a decision of industrial policy and strategic weight in Europe.
