

November 11, 1961: 64 years since the Kindu massacre, the sacrifice of 13 Italian aviators on a peace mission

Published on 11/11/2025

Sixty-four years ago, in a remote location in the Congolese equatorial forest, thirteen Italian aviators from the 46th Air Brigade of Pisa were brutally killed while serving the cause of peace, under the United Nations flag. It is a painful page of our national history, a sacrifice that still represents a wound and at the same time a warning: peace has a price, and it is often paid by silent men, far from the spotlight.

The context: Congo between chaos and international interests

Congo gained independence from Belgium in 1960, inheriting an institutional void and deep tribal fractures, fueled by colonial and geopolitical interests.

Complicating the picture, international powers and interests moved to influence the country's destiny, attracted by its immense mineral and strategic resources. In this context, the secession of Katanga took shape, the richest and most industrialized region, supported by substantial foreign capital and the employment of European mercenaries.

The young Congolese state found itself divided between three centers of power:

- the central government of President Joseph Kasa-Vubu, with the forces of Colonel Joseph-Désiré Mobutu in the western sector;
- the supporters of Patrice Lumumba, led by Antoine Gizenga and General Lundula, with Soviet support in the eastern regions;
- the secessionist Katanga of Moïse Ciombe (Tshombe), supported by mercenaries and European economic influences.

The crisis quickly escalated. In July 1960, just a month after independence, Katanga declared its autonomy, starting a civil war. Shortly after, Patrice Lumumba, the first Congolese prime minister and symbol of the attempt to emancipate from external control, was assassinated. The murder — perpetrated by Katangese forces with the complicity of the central power — opened an even more dramatic phase. Mobutu, then head of the army, would consolidate an authoritarian regime lasting almost forty years in the following years.

In this explosive climate, amid internal rivalries and international pressures, the United Nations decided to intervene: in August 1960, with the ONUC mission, the blue helmets were deployed in an attempt to stabilize the country and prevent a large-scale regional conflict.

November 11, 1961: 64 years since the Kindu massacre, the sacrifice of 13 Italian aviators on a peace

United Nations mission units in Congo (ONUC) near Élisabethville, in 1963 - UN Photo/BZ

The Italian crews and the last mission

The two Italian aircraft — C-119 “Lyra 5” and “Lupo 33” — had been operating in African skies for over a year. On November 21, they were to return home.

On November 11, they took off from Leopoldville to deliver supplies to the Malaysian UN garrison in the Kindu area, on the edge of the Congolese forest.

The region had been shaken by weeks of violence and tensions: armed gangs, propaganda, suspicion towards anyone foreign. There was an unfounded fear of a Belgian mercenary airdrop supporting Katanga's secession. The Italian planes were supposed to stop in Kindu only long enough to unload and for the crews to eat something.

The massacre

The appearance of the two Italian C-119s, mistaken for Katangese aircraft loaded with paratroopers, triggered panic among the Kindu soldiers. Hundreds of militiamen reached the airport by truck: the thirteen aviators, led by Major Amedeo Parmeggiani, were eating at the UN canteen, a villa about a kilometer from the runway, along with about ten Malaysian officers.

Around 4:15 PM, a first group of about 80 Congolese soldiers stormed the building: Italians and Malaysians, almost all unarmed, were overpowered and beaten; medical lieutenant Francesco Paolo Remotti, in an attempt to escape through a window, was caught and killed.

At 4:30 PM, another 300 militiamen led by the local commander, Colonel Pakassa, arrived. Malaysian Major Maud tried in vain to explain that the aviators were UN personnel. At 4:50 PM, the twelve survivors, forced to carry Remotti's body, were loaded onto trucks, taken to the city, and locked in the small prison. Meanwhile, arriving from Leopoldville, General Lundula and ONUC officials attempted to negotiate, but to no avail: the Congolese command appeared unable to control its men.

During the night, Congolese soldiers stormed the cells and shot the twelve Italians. The bodies, initially left on site, were soon after taken by the prison warden who, fearing desecration, transported them to the forest and buried them in a mass grave. The militiamen meanwhile spread the rumor that the Italians were supplying the secessionists and that they had been lured to Kindu by a supposed trick of the control tower; a few days later, the envoy Alberto Ronchey from La Stampa found that the tower had been out of service for months, debunking those versions.

The return home and the mourning of a Nation

For days, silence fell. No news came about the fate of the thirteen aviators, and even the UN command avoided rash moves to prevent chain reactions, unaware that the Italian soldiers had already been killed. Only weeks later, the prison warden found the courage to contact the Arcidiacono brothers, Italians who had been in Kindu for years: thanks to their information, it was possible to piece together the facts and activate the United Nations for the recovery of the remains.

In February 1962, a convoy of the Austrian Red Cross, escorted by Ethiopian blue helmets and accompanied by two officers of the 46th Air Brigade (Lieutenant Colonel Picone and Major Poggi), located the mass grave in the Tokolote cemetery, a village on the banks of the Lualaba. The bodies, protected by a thick layer of clay, were in such condition as to allow immediate identification.

Transferred to the Kindu airport, they were loaded onto an Italian C-119 for Leopoldville and then returned to Italy aboard a US C-130.

The thirteen Fallen of Kindu

- Maj. pilot Amedeo Parmeggiani
- Capt. pilot Giorgio Gonelli
- Lt. medical officer Francesco Paolo Remotti
- 2nd Lt. pilot Onorio De Luca
- 2nd Lt. pilot Giulio Garbati
- W.O. engineer Filippo Di Giovanni
- W.O. engineer Nazzareno Quadrumani
- Sgt. Maj. flight electrician Armando Fabi
- Sgt. Maj. radio operator Antonio Mamone
- Sgt. Maj. fitter Silvestro Possenti
- Sgt. Maj. fitter Nicola Stigliani
- Sgt. flight electrician Martano Marcacci
- Sgt. radio operator Francesco Paga

The memory and the value of the sacrifice

For decades, the event remained steeped in pain, confused stories, international indignation. Only in 1994 were the Fallen awarded the Gold Medal for Military Valor. In 2007, a compensation law for the families was approved.

Today, monuments and memorials preserve their memory: from Pisa to Fiumicino, from Milan to many Italian towns that have named streets and squares after the Fallen of Kindu.

Sixty-four years after that November 11, 1961, Italy remembers its aviators with respect and gratitude.

In a world that still knows conflicts, instability, and complex international missions, the sacrifice of the Fallen of Kindu reminds us of the value of silent service, of military commitment alongside democratic institutions and peoples in difficulty.