

Under Attack: How Britain Has Disarmed Russian Influence

Published on 19/08/2026

For over two decades, diplomatic relations between London and Moscow have experienced progressive and relentless deterioration, culminating in an apparently unbridgeable divide following the Russian invasion of Ukraine in February 2022. Despite the cooling of political relations, Russian influence in the United Kingdom has grown extensively, prompting the Parliamentary Intelligence and Security Committee (ISC) to define such presence as the "new normal". An in-depth analysis of the dynamics at play reveals how the United Kingdom is reshaping its regulatory, economic and military architecture to counter a multifaceted threat ranging from illicit capital to information warfare and critical infrastructure sabotage.

The Sinister Attraction of Capital: The End of "Londongrad"

In the period preceding the conflict in Ukraine, the United Kingdom represented a destination of choice for the Russian economic elite. The combination of a flourishing real estate market, an excellent financial sector, permissive corporate regulation and a network of professionals transformed the British capital into the hub of a veritable laundering of influence and capital. Oligarchs close to the Kremlin exploited cultural institutions, universities and football clubs (notable the case of the sale of Chelsea FC by Roman Abramovich) to gain credibility in civil society and "clean" their reputation.

- Russian Financial Assets (2023):£8.2 Bn
- Frozen Assets (Sanctions):£22.7 Bn
- Trade Exchange Collapse:-90%

Financial assets held by Russian foreign residents in the United Kingdom collapsed from nearly 29 billion pounds at the end of 2021 to approximately 8.2 billion at the end of 2023. In parallel, British authorities froze over 22.7 billion pounds under the sanctions regime. To eradicate the flow of funds of dubious origin, Parliament approved two key reforms: the Economic Crime (Transparency and Enforcement) Act 2022 — which established a public register to identify beneficial owners of foreign property and strengthened Unexplained Wealth Orders (UWO) — and the Economic Crime and Corporate Transparency Act 2023, designed to enhance investigative capabilities against shell companies.

Hybrid Warfare, Espionage and Legislative Response

Threats from Moscow are not limited to the financial sphere. From the dramatic poisoning of Sergei and Yulia Skripal in Salisbury in 2018, attributed to Russian intelligence services, hostile activity has evolved toward increasingly aggressive forms. As highlighted by the Director General of MI5, Ken McCallum, investigations linked to state threats have increased by 48% in a single year, exposing how the Russian military agency GRU is engaged in a "sustained mission to generate chaos on British and European streets" through acts of sabotage, arson and cyber attacks channeled through criminal intermediaries.

> "The international order is under threat in a way not seen since the end of the Cold War. We are witnessing a reckless campaign of sabotage across Europe."

> — Joint Statement by the heads of MI6 (Sir Richard Moore) and CIA (Bill Burns), September 2024

The State's response materialized in the National Security Act 2023, a far-reaching measure that introduces offenses for foreign interference, modern espionage and sabotage. Among the main innovations is the Foreign Influence Registration Scheme (FIRS), a public register designed to ensure transparency on lobbying activities on behalf of foreign governments. Moreover, the Government definitively closed in February 2022 the Tier 1 (Investor) visa scheme — the so-called "golden visas" — and expanded the powers of national exclusion for elites linked to Vladimir Putin's regime.

Democratic Integrity, Media and Critical Infrastructure Security

The defense of democratic institutions represents another crucial front. Despite the paper-based electoral system offering protection against direct tampering, attempts at political conditioning manifest through opaque financing and disinformation campaigns. The Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 (PPERA) and the Elections Act 2022 introduced stricter rules on donation traceability and spending limits for foreign third-party actors.

On the information front, the regulatory authority Ofcom revoked the broadcasting license from state broadcaster Russia Today (RT) in March 2022 for lack of impartiality and accuracy. Simultaneously, the Online Safety Act 2023 qualified foreign interference as a priority offense, obliging social platforms to block disinformation sponsored by hostile states.

In maritime and infrastructure matters, concern is growing over the activities of the Russian shadow fleet and spy ships (such as the Yantar) spotted near British territorial waters with the aim of mapping submarine cables and energy pipelines. London has intensified Royal Navy patrols, updated rules of engagement and activated the Joint Expeditionary Force (JEF) in the Baltic Sea to defend seabed security and prevent economic sabotage operations.

Conclusions

The countering of Russian influence marks a lasting paradigm shift in the United Kingdom's security policy. With the era of tolerance toward opaque capital closed, London is articulating an integrated strategy that merges regulatory rigor, cyber defense, media protection and military deterrence. The ability to maintain this operational front will determine the democratic resilience and geopolitical stability of the Country in the decades to come.
